For example, we will take series No. 25, which has five glazes. Into each of these five glazes were dipped three trials of each body, white, red and buff. These were put into setters as follows: Three setters of each white, red and buff body; one setter of each body for the three divisions of the kiln. The setters were now put in such tiers and placed in the kiln in such a position as would place the bodies and glaze series as before described, after which the wicket was closed and the firing begun at once. THE FIRING OF THE TRIALS. The trials were burnt under tile-setters similar to those used by the U. S-Encaustic Tile Co., the gaps between setters being well luted. The total length of the burn was approximately 22 hours, which was divided into...
