Excerpt from The Foreign Quarterly Review, Vol. 17: Published in April, 1836 and July, 1836 Thus the evening gradually approaches, and is announced by a slight diminution of the current of air. It is in vain for language to attempt a description of the splendour of a sunset in these latitudes. It is the only time of day when the groups of singularly formed, yet light and transparent, clouds range themselves on the horizon. Their transient existence favours the changing play of colours, because the refraction of the more oblique rays of the sun produces the most extraordinary effects. Even after we have repeatedly beheld the rising or setting of the sun from the summit of the Alps, or indeed from the top of the Andes, we are constrained to give unconditional preference to the same scene as viewed on the tropical ocean. While one side of the ship is still illumined with the last uncertain rays of the setting sun, the sea on the other side, darkened by the broad shadow of the sails, begins to sparkle. One fiery point after another appears in indistinct rays of light shining from a greater depth, and, as darkness sets in, a new creation seems to be called into life. Luminous creatures glance in every direction through the dark expanse of water; now shooting up like sparks then rising in globules of fire, or passing away with the rapidity of lightning - a great part are probably real nocturnal animals, which conceal themselves in the sea from the light of the sun. We were now within four English miles of the celebrated Cape Horn,...
