Other studies are on War and Savagery, Magic or Religion and the Primitive Medicine Man. Such subjects are beyond the scope of a brief notice in a literary journal; and in particular the views on psychology and folk-lore, though put with all clearness, are of necessity somewhat technical. Our province is only to present that which we regard as their key-note. It goes to show that the reign of materialism is over, even in the folk-lore societies. Among Dr. Marett's earliest utterances there is one which tells us that in this department of research we have only ourselves to blame if we turn aside. . . and are presently engulfed in the dismal slough of materialism. The study of mana and tabu is the study of a savage with a soul, and all that belongs to their history is a mere outward integument and garb...
