Many concerns would like to use, if possible, a babbitt made from a certain formula that has been known to give satisfaction in the past, and with care in weighing, selection of the furnace and observing certain precautions in melting the various metals, excellent results can be obtained with very, little loss. With the exception of the modification of the Alexander method for lead, the methods may be old, but they have been selected from the many methods in use for their simplicity, neatness and accuracy of analysis of a babbitt of known composition. At the same time reactions and data have been inserted, which will be of interest to the student in analytical chemistry.
